We Can Help....

Workplace violence has become one of the most serious risk management issues facing Canadian employers. Bill 168, an amendment to Ontario's health and safety laws, mandates a range of strict new standards that apply to all provincially-regulated employers with 5 or more staff.

Bill 168 compels employers to assess the risks of violence across all work activities in all work locations. Based on the risk assessment findings, employers must develop violence and harassment policies as well as a comprehensive workplace violence program.

At David Hyde and Associates we are Bill 168 specialists. We offer a range of workplace violence prevention services from basic "health checks" to complete Bill 168 compliance solutions to employers of all types and sizes.

The assessment tools and compliance methods we have adopted are based on standards endorsed by Ontario's Ministry of Labour, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health & Safety ("CCOHS") and the Occupational Health & Safety Council of Ontario ("OHSCO").

Program Review and Evaluation

Under Bill 168, employers must assess the risks of violence related to the nature and circumstances of the workplace, type and conditions of work, and common issues in similar workplaces.

The policy under Bill 168 should show the employer's commitment to protect workers from violence and set out clear standards of behaviour within the workplace.

The program under Bill 168 must include measures to control the risks identified in the assessment as well as procedures to summon immediate assistance. Steps for workers to report violence and the approach to be taken to investigate violent incidents are also required.

The Bill compels employers to provide training to workers on the workplace violence program. Finally, employers must assess the risk of domestic violence, as well as the risk from persons with a violent history who are expected to frequent the workplace.
